GOOD BILL AT THE TEMPLE.
William Farnum in "The Man Hunter" is the feature play for the Temple theater today. Mr. Farnum shows you not only one fight but three in this picture. You will be interested in these fights because each has a big powerful reason behind it. Everyone of them thrills, but in two Farnum comes off second best because in the first the police get him and in the second the officers of a ship arrest him and chain him up in the hold of the vessel, at the third you will heartily applaud, for on a desert island with only a pretty, wealthy girl as a witness, the villain meets his just end.

THE MEETING

She knew there was another girl seated on the other end of the bench when she sat down; but it was several minutes before, drawing her gaze away from the open gates across the park's grassy common, she looked into the startled eyes of Esther Price.

"Is that you, Esther?" said Viola shortly. Then she added in blundering tones, "I haven't seen you for a long time."

"I've been away," Esther gave a gentle cough, and smiled faintly. "That cold hung on, you see. After I left the store, the doctor said I must have a change. So I went to my aunt's in the country. I'm all right now."

"H'm, sounds like it. And you sitting here in a cold wind?" "It isn't so windy, and the sun's warm. The doctor recommends air. But I'm all right now," Esther repeated. "It's a nervous cough. It doesn't mean anything. How are you, Viola?"

"I'm one of the strong kind. I can stand anything," Viola spoke with ostentatious pride, chin in air. Her gaze traveled to the distant gateway and back again. "Did you ever hear anything of Val Henry, while you were away?" she asked abruptly.

"Val? Oh, no," replied the other released from scarlet fever quarantine.

girl, and gave her little cough again. "I have wondered, of course," she swung sideways and looked at Esther almost fiercely. "I don't know what we're holding back for. I don't know why—since we're spoken at all—we don't go right on and say what's in our minds. Things aren't as they used to be. People are different—they have to be. I thought I hated you, Esther Price; and now I don't hate you at all."

Esther's eyes opened solemnly. "Oh, Viola! I don't see why you ever hated me."

"I suppose you mean you were the one to do the hating," snapped Viola. "I took Val Henry away from you, and I'm wearing his ring. But if you think that's all there is to it, you're mistaken."

She spurned an eddying cluster of dry leaves with the pointed toe of her high boot.

"When Val went away, I knew that wasn't all there was to it," she continued. "Before that life was just a sort of carnival for me. You know how I loved pleasure. Esther, and I could go and go, and never tire."

Viola's voice took on a tone of unwonted kindness. "I'm sorry I hurt your feelings, Esther. But I cared for Val Henry myself. He was the only one I really cared for. And you let him go—so easily!"

It was Esther's frail form that stiffened with pride now, and a rising blush warmed her features. "Love isn't like that to me. And I'd rather not talk about it. You say you should have seen Val in his uniform. Such a soldier!"

Viola sneered suddenly, speaking with animation. "That's why I liked him. He was so tall and straight, and strong like me. But now"—Viola paused, but quickly responded to the mute appeal of Esther's alarmed glance.

"He's living, yes. I got a letter from him when he was in the hospital, but his right leg is gone. And when I heard they were going to take that and leave him a cripple—do you know what I did, Esther? I prayed that he would die first!"

Esther, regarding her in incredulous horror, involuntarily drew her skirts away. Her pale face flamed while her eyes glowed with righteous indignation.

"Viola Melien—you prayed for Val's death? You did not want a cripple returning to claim you. And you call that love!" Her kente voice was edged with fine scorn. "Oh, you wanted him to stay tall and straight, and strong like you. What if he is a cripple? All the more he needs your care, your love. Poor Val!"

Hot tears gushed to her eyes and she coughed spasmodically. At last, stared at her, inscrutably reflective.

"I suppose you wouldn't feel that way about it. You think my love's a pretty poor sort. But that's the way I felt. I don't say I feel that way now. But would you want the man you loved, loved and was so proud of—to come back to you broken and pitiful? Only half a man, Esther?"

"I shouldn't care if he was only a quarter of a man. He'd be my man," declared Esther with passionate intensity. "And I don't care if you are wearing Val Henry's ring. I love him more at this moment than ever before—because he is a cripple."

A look that was akin to awe softened Viola's lips, brilliant comeliness as she absorbed the fervor of Esther's speech, the exalted glow of her delicate features.

"Well, Esther, Val Henry isn't a cripple. They saved his leg, after all. And he's home on leave, and I'm waiting for him. That's why I've been watching the park gates." Viola shrugged her shoulders wearily. "I wanted to know how you would take the news. But there's another thing, Esther. I never took your place with Val, never. He thought you didn't care enough. And when he went away, there was something on his mind—oh, I understood all the time. Esther, there he is."

Both girls sprang to their feet at the same instant, their eyes upon the solitary figure which was coming through the park gateway. It was a tall, gaunt looking figure in uniform, walking carefully with the aid of a cane.

"You see he is not quite well yet," said Viola, her voice strangely husky. "Esther, I want you to go and meet him."

"I?" gasped the other girl.

"Yes. He was thinking of you when he went away. Didn't I tell you I understood?" She gave the other girl a little push. "Go meet him, Esther. You will know what to say to him."

"But suppose you're wrong?" stammered Esther. "I am you?" "Go and meet him," Viola smiled with a touch of her old pettiness. "If I'm wrong—why, I shall be waiting here. You'll know what to do. Hurry, Esther. He's going the other way."

Once started, Esther flew like one of the autumn leaves before the wind. Across the common, along the winding path after a slow-moving, limping form in khaki.

The girl on the bench strained her eyes after the two disappearing forms. They did not return. And, after a while, she rose and walked quickly away, stumbling because of the tears that blinded her.

TRAMP STEAMER SAVES TRANS-ATLANTIC FLYERS

probably would have dashed his machine into the sea far from aid. This storm would have been encountered by Hawker about two hours after he passed the spot where he came down.

The first direct word from Hawker received here was a message to the London Daily Mail which offered the $50,000 prize for the first trans-Atlantic flight. This message was sent from on board the Revenue in Scapa Flow and said:

"The machine stopped owing to the filter feed pipe from the radiator to the water pump being blocked with refuse-like solder shifting loose in the radiator. It was no fault of the motor, which was perfect from start to finish. There was no trouble in landing on the water. A dory picked us up after an hour and a half."
